ARGUMENT

(1) Daniel Charles Cooke demanded an appeal and an evidentiary hearing should be ordered.

The State argues that the instant case does not warrant a remand for an evidentiary hearing because this case is not analogous to Toston v. State, 127 Nev. 971, 267 P.3d 795 (2011). Respondent's Answering Brief 7-8. The State faults Mr. Cooke for not having the type of "outburst" that was indicated in Toston. Respondent's Answering Brief 7.

The idea that Mr. Cooke expressed no dissatisfaction with the sentence is belied by the record. Mr. Cooke, through his legal counsel, made it abundantly clear that he was entering into negotiations wherein the defense would not be bound to recommend the maximum sentence of eight to twenty (8-20) years in the Nevada Department of Corrections. Respondent's Appendix 6-7. The idea that Mr. Cooke was anything less than dissatisfied with an eight to twenty (8-20) year sentence given that negotiating position is easy to dispel. Of course, Mr. Cook was dissatisfied with the maximum sentence – especially when he withdrew from a previously negotiated settlement that would have required him to stipulate to the maximum sentence. Respondent's Appendix 6-7.

The State selectively cites to the record by focusing on a written demand for an appeal that preceded the sentencing date. Respondent's Answering Brief 8. The State neglects to refer to the portion of the Joint Appendix wherein Mr. Cooke stated on his petition that he "ask[ed] [his] attorney the day of sentencing to appeal and sent him a letter that next week stating I wanted to appeal and he would not respond." Joint Appendix 5.

Any defect with regards to the date of the demand letter is more than cured by the fact that Mr. Cooke clarified that said letter was sent the week after sentencing, not the year before sentencing.

The State says that Mr. Cooke's assertion that he requested an appeal of his defense attorney was not "factual" and, as such, "Cooke was not entitled to an evidentiary hearing." Respondent's Answering Brief 8. It is easy for the State to argue that a demand to appeal is not "factual" when an evidentiary hearing was not held in the first place.

However, it is hard for the State to justify the district court's denial of an evidentiary hearing when Mr. Cooke was unjustifiably denied the ability to establish the "factual" nature of said demand. Put another way, the State complains about the lack of an evidentiary basis for the demand for an appeal when the State contributed to this situation by fighting against Mr. Cooke's ability to have an evidentiary hearing. The State cannot have it both ways.

Even without the demand letter in the record, Mr. Cooke's claim in the petition itself justified an evidentiary hearing on this basis. The State does not even try to defend the district court's rationale for denying the evidentiary hearing – specifically, the fact that Mr. Cooke did not explain the grounds for an appeal. Joint Appendix 131. Nowhere in the case law of Nevada does one's right to appeal a conviction get restricted by a defendant's lack of articulation as to the precise grounds for appeal.

In rejecting the idea that Mr. Cooke should have had an evidentiary hearing, the State focuses exclusively on the demand letter and overlooks the fact that Mr. Cooke gave oral notice to his counsel that an appeal needs to be filed.

While undersigned counsel can understand the zeal of the State in securing a conviction against someone who is accused of Attempted Sexual Assault on a Minor, this understanding does not extend to the State's desire to deny Mr. Cooke his day in court on the postconviction habeas petition. The State's position that would keep Mr. Cooke from having an evidentiary hearing (and that would allow Mr. Cooke to more fully develop his claims) must be rejected.

In Hargrove v. State, 100 Nev. 498, 503, 686 P.2d 222, 225 (1984), citing Grondin v. State, 97 Nev. 454, 634 P.2d 456 (1981), this Court held that a "defendant seeking post-conviction relief is not entitled to an evidentiary hearing on factual allegations belied or repelled by the record."

The State argues that the letter demanding an appeal "is a letter predating sentencing, not filed, bearing no hallmarks of trustworthiness, and belied by the record in his conduct and actions at sentencing." Respondent's Answering Brief 8. What action of Mr.

Cooke's would have been consistent with waiving a direct appeal? No action exists. As such, it is hard to comprehend the State's argument in this regard. Mr. Cooke never expressed one iota of satisfaction with having been given the absolute maximum level of incarceration.

The State's commentary on a lack of trustworthiness is ironic because it is actively preventing Mr. Cooke for having the very type of hearing (namely, an evidentiary hearing) that would afford Mr. Cooke the opportunity to take the witness stand so that the trustworthiness of the letter as well as Mr. Cooke could be tested.

As for its citation to Davis v. State, 115 Nev. 17, 974 P.2d 658 (1999), the State is correct. "The burden is on the client to indicate to his attorney that he wishes to pursue an appeal." Id. at 20, 660.

Mr. Cooke is more than happy to meet his burden at an evidentiary hearing and is confident that he will meet that burden when he has the opportunity to put on evidence as well as witnesses – including his former defense counsel. However, the State wants to deny this opportunity to meet this burden. This position is untenable and does not comport with due process.

CONCLUSION

Appellant Daniel Charles Cooke reaffirms his position that the district court erred in denying him an evidentiary hearing on his postconviction petition for writ of habeas corpus. This is especially the case with the appeal deprivation claim.

Mr. Cooke wants an opportunity to make a full record as to his allegation that his imprisonment is illegal. The State has made it abundantly clear in its Answering Brief that it wants that opportunity to be denied. Due process requires otherwise.
